

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

AN EXPLANATION

First let me say that I use the word "speech" in its broadest sense as including every method of transmitting intellectual light and heat. When confronted with the task of making classifications for this bibliography I was perplexed by the absence of precedent. First came the thought of a chronological arrangement, with author and subject-index. With a chronological arrangement, every item of one's interest might be found on a different page, needing to be traced by oft repeated references to the subject index. Hence a waste of time. The chronological arrangement has obvious advantages only for students of the historical development of the free speech issue.

One asks, why not make a subdivision on the basis of the external circumstances to which censorship is applied. Thus: Street-speaking, Theatre, Moving pictures, Parks, Post Office, Express, Inter-State Commerce, Newspapers, Magazines, Pictures, etc. This again involves and multiplies the same confusion as the chronological arrangement, and would furnish a minimum of help to those seeking light. Persons using this bibliography will seldom have their interests centre around the physical circumstances of censorship. That interest is more likely to be motived in some fundamental lust for power, satisfiable by means of reputation, of property, or of political and religious institutions, and sexual customs. This reference to the human impulses that make for censorship may almost be called the psycho-genetic approach to a bibliographical classification. From this point of view, most censorships would be classified under such heads as sex motive, religious motive, economic motive, personal motive, etc. Under each of these could be subheads which relate more specifically to the motive, or other classifiable quality of the censored expression or persons. Thus economic motive would have such subhead as socialism, anarchism, labor unions, etc. Under sex motive we should think of birth control, sex-education, sex-reformers, etc. Under religious motives come blasphemy, Church and State, etc.

There is a marked change in the character of the discussion of mental freedom between the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Under the former rule by an alleged divine right, liberty and censorship upon every subject found their strongest justification in what was claimed to be the will of God. All was based upon the union of the privileged Church and the State. All was justified by biblical interpretations, and theologic dogma. Then it was scarcely safe to urge merely considerations of temporal expediency, or of right, not based upon "the will of God", as revealed in "Holy Writ". Yet, these older discussions have great historic value, for the better understanding of our constitutional guarantees of free speech. By whatever name called, all the old epithetic characterizations of the suppressed idea were originally but different names for blasphemy. All attacks upon government, established economic and social privileges, and religious institutions, were thought pernicious, primarily because they were believed to be somehow a denial of Holy Writ, as interpreted by the official Christianity. Treason against God was necessarily a treason against His State, and treason against the divinely ordained State was always a treason against God. Blasphemy and Sedition were really the same. Accordingly I have thought it best to place all material bearing date before the year 1800 in a separate group. Because its interest lies wholly in its historical value, I have thought to enhance that value by a chronological arrangement.

With the American and French Revolution men began to repudiate political "divine right", and to insist upon "natural rights" and temporal expediency and the guarantees of written constitutions. It is in the previous controversies that we must find the meaning of the decisions expressed in our bills of rights. It is these earlier grievances and demands that must be understood, if we are ever to achieve an intelligent historical interpretation of our guarantees for intellectual liberty and equality.

The "divine will" in censorship has not recommended itself highly by its achievement. More and more reliance is based upon social expediency. With the disappearance of a single standard of divine revelation, as a basis for censorship, we find a growing diversity in the ideas which are suppressed and in the subtle disguises under which the extensions of censorship are made. Formerly the justifying pretence was a danger to man's everlasting soul. Now we have invented new justifications for indulging the same old childish fears, and the resultant brutal resentment. These new justifications, according to my view, are based upon ignorant conceptions of the psychology or suggestion. Soon these problems will be differently handled by the genetic psychologists. For this reason also I deem it desirable to make a classification on the basis of the motive for censorship.

With these changing attitudes, and the multiplication of our petty tyrants, according to the more democratic fashion, there has come a corresponding growth in the modes and subjects of censorships. This ever spreading restraint upon freedom of utterance is commensurate with the growing diversity of method for expressing and transmitting ideas. Thus come discussions which cannot logically or helpfully be forced into any of the time-honored moulds, or groupings. If now we insist upon doing so we shall have to extend them into fields which have not heretofore acquired the familiar labels. This would create new confusion, more than sufficient to counterbalance the advantage of retaining the old names.

When we have thus made a classification into the larger groups according to the impulse that makes for censorship, and sub-classifications according to characteristics belonging to the censored, then there still remain discussions which our present habits of thought seem to place outside any of these groups. Here I have in mind discussions of the Alien & Sedition Laws, and the war censorship. These may be best placed in a separate group. There exists also some discussions of free speech whose character is too general for special classification, or is unknown. These items will be found under the head of General Discussions. An author's index covering the whole list under alphabetical arrangement will furnish another avenue of approach to the contents of this bibliography.

Having now outlined the method of classifications let me indicate the mode of reasoning by which the classification may be discovered in cases of obscurity. Where should one look for a discussion of contempt of court? Let us assume that the contempt proceedings are based upon a violation of an injunction against a strike. Here are two probable motives involved. The obvious one is the economic motive, which makes the first classification. But again the vanity and reputation of the judge may be impaired, especially if he is denounced in addition to being defied. Here then the impulse of the judge is such as if he had been slandered. Therefore, such an item, like all contempts that are based on criticism or disrespect of courts, should be classified also under "personal motive". The same would be more or less true of a public discussion which might appear as an interference with the judge's mode of conducting a trial. If instead of being a criminal trial it was one over property rights, then the economic motive also exists and classification is made accordingly.

Thus also, the defamation of a play, and not of an actor, is classified under "economic-motive" as affecting the finances of the author and producer. If the denunciation or censorship was upon account of its "obscenity" it will be also classified under "sex-motive". If the discussion is one of the right to defame an actor, then the classification is "personal-motive". Likewise a discussion of "slander of title" to property would obviously involve the economic-motive. Suppressions because of aspersions of a class, such as Jews, Irish, Germans, Catholics, etc., partake of the nature of personal libel and slander because effecting personal reputation. Therefore, the classification is under "personal-motive". By similar reasoning a postal censorship over business methods, as in fraudulent representation by mails would be classified under "economic-motive". The same is true where a libel is charged because of a false report as to one's financial responsibility. This, however, might also have the aspect of a personal libel. There has also been discussion and litigation over a law requiring publicity as to the ownership of periodicals. The reason for this legislation was to preclude secrecy as to motives for articles and advertising involving industrial and economic questions. This again determines the classification as under "economic-motive".

In gathering material for this bibliography, I received aid from many friends of free speech, I received specially valuable help from the Yale University Library. Among the individuals who gave valuable aid I make grateful acknowledgment to Mr. Herbert C. Collar and Miss Janet Frederica Melvain, then of the New York Public Library School; and Mr. Gordon Thayer of the Harvard Library. Last but not least I make grateful acknowledgment for help through many years, given to me by my wife and co-worker (Miss Nancy E. Sankey-Jones). It is probable that a supplement to this bibliography will be, sometime, published. I will therefore be grateful if any persons will call my attention to omissions of needed additions.

All through these volumes are solicitations and arguments for toleration of various heretics. These brought the author into difficulty and prompted him to write several defensive essays which are attached to this edition as follows: published in vol. V. (a) A dissertation concerning the book of Stephanus Junius Brutus printed in the year 1579, p731-42. This dissertation deals with the book: Vindiciae contra tyrannos, sive de principiis in populum, populi in principem legitima potestate. (b.) A dissertation concerning defamatory libels, on occasion of a passage from Tacitus. * * * p743-65. This contains much unusual data especially of ancient history. (c.) An explanation concerning things dispersed in this dictionary, which may be reduced to four general heads: 1. The praises bestowed on persons who denied either the providence or the existence of God. 2. The objections of the Manichees. 3. The objections of the skeptics. 4. Obscenities. p810-58. These defenses are constructed by an unusual mind with an unusual psychologic insight. The "Explanation concerning obscenities" is republished in: Schroeder, T. Free press anthology, p114-48. 1909.

Mill makes a fine general argument for free speech but would abridge when the circumstances are such as "to constitute their expression a positive instigation to some mischievous act." That has been the justification for every censorship.

Free speech part of Mill's essay is included in Schroeder, T. "Free press anthology."

In his "Autobiography," (New York, Holt, 1874) p251-6, Mill gives an account of the origin of "On liberty," and his own appreciation of the importance of that performance.
